The Vagaries of a Starving Man

Mr. Everts, who was lost in the Yellowstone, contributes to Serioner's an intersely interesting account of his "Thirty-seven Days of Peril," We

"I lost all sense of time. Days and nights came and went, and were numbered only by the growing consciousness that I was gradually starving. I felt no hunger, dld not cat to appears appetite, but to renew strongth. I experienced but little pain. The gaping sores on my feet, the severe barn on my hip, the festering crevices at the joints of my fingers, all terrible in appearance, had ceased to give me the least concern. The roots which supplied my food had suspended the digestive powers of the stomach, and their fibres were packed in it in a matted, compact mass.

"Not so with my hours of slumber. They were visited by the most Juxurious dreams. I would apparently visit the most gorgeously decorated restaurants of New York and Weshington; sit down to immense tables spread with the most appetizing vlands; partake of the richest oyster stows and plumpest ples; engage myself in the labor and preparation of carious dishes, and with them fill range upon range of elegantly furnished tables until they fairly grouned beneath the dainties prepared by my own bands. Frequently the entire night would seem to have been spent in getting up a sumptuous dipper. I would realize the fatigue of rossting, boiling, baking, and tabeleating the choicest dishes known to the modern esister, and in my disturbed slumbers would enjoy with epicurean relish the food thus furnished even to repletion.
